

COLUMBIA TEACHERS ELECTED

School Board Makes Few Changes in Instructors and Their Salaries.

Only four changes in the personnel of the faculty of the Columbia public schools and even fewer raises in salaries of teachers were made by the Columbia School Board last night when it met to elect the public school teachers for next year. Changes in the faculty were only made where the present instructors did not apply for reelection. The lack of funds made a general raise in salaries impossible at the present time.

Miss Gladys Wheat, who at the present time is an assistant instructor in the art department of the University and also a student in the School of Journalism, was elected supervisor of drawing to fill the place now held by Miss Lillian Johnson. Allison Reppy, also a student in the University, whose home is at Hillsboro, Mo., was elected athletic director and head of the physical education department. E. M. Todd, present director, did not apply for the position.

BEATS K. U. IN DEBATE

Missouri Team, Defending Monroe Doctrine, Wins by 2 to 1 Vote.

Missouri got a 2 to 1 decision over Kansas in debating last night in the University Auditorium. Missouri had the negative of the question: "Resolved, that the United States should abandon the Monroe Doctrine." This is the first time a three-man team has been used in the annual debate between the two universities.

C. W. Carson opened the debate for Kansas. He said the debate would hinge upon the interpretation of the question. Kansas interpreted it in the light of the present, saying it was changed, obscure and indefinite, and leads to dictation and aggression, as in the case of the Panama Canal.

Don Joseph was the second speaker for Kansas. He said the United States was at a disadvantage and in danger from Europe in upholding the doctrine. Europe holds us responsible for debts and insults while Latin America is disgusted with us, he said. In his rebuttal, Mr. Joseph quoted Theodore Roosevelt to show the Panama Canal Zone was acquired under the doctrine. This point of aggression was denied by Missouri and led to pointed clashes.

W. E. Weddell closed the debate for Kansas. He asked Missouri to define the question; to reconcile it with the acts of the United States and asked what we would do if Germany should attack the Canal. He contended that the strength of a nation was in the character of the people and in its army and navy.

Paul H. Arthur opened for Missouri. He said the countries of South America are weak from a military, financial and industrial standpoint and need our aid. The vast territories offer great inducements to European aggression. Industrially, Europe runs the mines and farms. In his rebuttal, Mr. Arthur said much friendship exists between the United States and South America and that trade limitations are not a sign of hostility.

M. H. Thornton spoke second for Missouri. He said that hostility was not justifiable, since it was created by "foreigners and through misconception. Prejudice is due to our superior size, wealth and population. The Monroe Doctrine keeps out the Germans and the Japanese. In his rebuttal, Mr. Thornton accused the affirmative of trying to keep the doctrine and call it something else.

E. K. Lutes, the last speaker for Missouri, used no set speech, but took up his time in rebuttal. He declared there had been no change in principle, since South America was weak and Europe was aggressive when the doctrine was promulgated and the same conditions are true today. In his last speech Mr. Lutes read from Roosevelt, denying that the Canal had been acquired because of the doctrine.

After the debate, a luncheon was served in Pemberton Hall for the Kansas debaters and the judges: H. J. Haskell, editor-in-chief of the Kansas City Star; Roger M. Baldwin, secretary of the St. Louis Civic League, and A. F. Postwick, librarian for the City of St. Louis. These men and Dr. C. K. Dykstra of Kansas, all gave short talks. Dr. F. M. Tisdell was toastmaster. President A. Ross Hill and D. C. McEuen spoke. About fifteen other persons attended.
